Program Outline

The Roundtable will include 45-50 participants (by invitation only) and will have a diverse program, with a mix of papers (i.e., oral talks, either long or short), workshops and project/lesson/technology demonstrations, all followed by extensive discussions and small group work. There will also be a poster session. In addition, a cordial social program will include a reception on the first evening and an (optional, extra cost) boat cruise +dinner on one of the evenings, plus a friendly atmosphere within the unique building of the Max-Planck Institute, with many opportunities for informal chats and small-group work with other participants.

We encourage submissions by colleagues from diverse backgrounds, including from researchers, graduate students, statisticians and educators in universities and other academic or R&D institutions, cognitive scientists, high-school (secondary) teachers and trainers, professionals from official statistics agencies, public agencies and the media, and technology specialists.

More details about the program will be published shortly.

Note 1 - about provisional acceptance: A "Provisional acceptance" means that an author is invited to the Roundtable - but on condition that the author indeed submits by Jan 31 a draft paper (developed based on the abstract) for the refereeing process, and commits to revise the draft based on the refereeing feedback and then upload a revised version by June 1. We clarify that the main purpose of the refereeing is to provide constructive feedback to authors whose abstract and background were found provisionally suitable, so they can improve their written paper before uploading to the conference website by June 1, 2016. However the IPC may have to reject a submission, even after provisional acceptance, if the results of the refereeing process are too negative or a draft paper was not submitted by Jan 31.
